There has been a lot of question lately in the newspapers around Montana of the safety of the Remington Model 700. Several incidents of accidental discharge have happened two of them resulting in deaths. I had a similar incident in 1975 with my Model 700. It went off by itself while laying unattended in the back of a pickup. The bullet went through the side of the truck, the spare tire, and my father-in-law who was removing the spare tire. I know I shouldn't have had a round in the chamber and I learned that lesson. Two different gunsmiths tried to duplicate the event but could not. My father-in-law lost a testicle in the deal and some blood but was OK otherwise. I had purchased the rifle new just a few months prior. I still have the rifle and use it alot. Never had any more trouble with it. What is Remington saying about this kind of problem? I should say also that the safety was on when my .270 went off. I have other Remington's including a Nylon 66 my dad bought me in 1963. It has no serial number.
Thanks Lenny Lytle
